This site is not available in your country After some time, some vacation, and with the wonderfully cute new baby daughter, I'm back online. At this time and especially during my last trip to Europe, I read several books - some of them were very interesting and others were boring to death. Don't worry, I won't tell you about the last one. Among the greats was The Autobiography of Sir Richard Branson (click on the link for more information and reviews). I bought the printed version at the airport, thinking it would be a good air travel book, that is, funny and with no real reason to activate any gray cells. God, I was wrong. The book is really very funny and clever, but it also brings invaluable ideas on how to do business out of passion and against all regular, conservative business assumptions. This is a book that shows that you can and should bring your own character to your business, and that foreboding is sometimes worth much more than a complex analysis of numbers. It also shows you that sometimes you will be wrong and that this is not only normal, but that you can seriously grow out of these mistakes. I won't be a spoiler, so I'll just write that if you're an entrepreneur, either in practice or at heart, and you're looking for a real inspiration experience that's written from the heart, you should grab a copy of this book now. This post is extracted from BizDevBlog After all, Piven caromed to us, and a woman in a halter kind of yelled at him: Jeremy! We had a great time at your birthday party in Malibu! Yes, he said. It's cool. I'm glad you had a good time. These are your girls He pointed to a few women standing next to, two of them wearing halter tops, too. Yes, said the girl in green, and then snowing to the other girls, and a few moments later one of them stood next to Piven, locked in conversation. I'm not the best at interpreting such signals, but her body seemed to be saying something like: I'll give you my number, of course, but if you prefer we'll just throw right here on top of this stack ag Shorty Sonics, it's not, too. Her mouth, however, played him steeper. You're from Ohio,' she said. People are very nice out there! Yes. No, Piven said, I'm from Chicago. You need to talk to me! She said. I'm from Ohio! The stylist, still on my side, muttered, Don't do it, man. You are much better than that. And then Piven burst into the pantomime. I know how to squabble, what sounds. I also know that it would be pretty easy and perhaps even satisfying, storytellingwise, to use this moment as a point of jump for a cynical portrayal of a GenX actor trapped in a Hollywood matrix-guy who struggled for twenty years and actually got his big break to play Hollywood cliches on a show about Hollywood cliches and the result of this big break... turned into a Hollywood cliché. There may even be some truth in this story. Of course there is, you think you're reading online. Spend a little bit there, and you'll find a lot of references to Piven cavorting with young wannabe models, or Piven making a worm at a car show, or Piven with his shirt in public for no apparent reason. You don't have to be Dorothy Parker to make hay with this stuff. But then you actually spend some time with the time guy, I have to point out he was extremely generous with- and, well, naturally, things get harder. For one thing, the mim shtick was very funny. On the other hand, whatever you think of him, Jeremy Piven isn't some jaded Hollywood asshole. I've seen him in a bunch of places now, dealing with any number of strangers, and he's never a guy who heads straight to the VIP suite or huffs out tired, eyeavoiding thanks to some fan who told him how cool he is. He's always there in the middle of the room, taking away all comers. As we stood outside the jeans store, I asked him what he had made of his stratospheric celebrity growth since the days of Entourage. Look, he said, for twenty years I was a guy who couldn't get my calls back. Now I'll complain when people stop me in the street and say they love the show and they love my character and they can't wait to see there's no more way. I'm not going to be that guy. I look at it like, bring it, man. Bring it on. _For full article, pick up the June issue _GQ. JOEL LOVELL - G.A. Function Editor Dan Hesse was confident of the company's decision to sell the iPhone via Virgin Mobile before the launch. We believe there is good demand for high-quality devices such as the iPhone in the prepaid market, he said in an interview with Bloomberg. There's a misconception that the prepaid market is only for people who are under economic challenge. It's not that. Our expectation, based on pre-orders, that the iPhone would do very well on Virgin.While Virgin Mobile spokeswoman Jane Wallace declined to comment on sales over the weekend, BTIG analyst, Walter Piecyk, noted that there was no zero activation of the iPhone line at eight RadioShack and Best Buy venues in New York and San Francisco. Piecyk noted in a blog post that there were no signage in stores or marketing materials to support the launch. While he believed that there would be that many people jumping at the chance to buy a prepaid iPhone, he found the lack of advertising strange. Phones were available, but the lack of marketing materials and comments from the store staff we spoke to indicated that they did not expect many of their customers to choose a more expensive version of the iPhone, he said. Conversely, Cricket, which has also just released an iPhone through its prepaid channel, described the opening weekend sales as fast, although it also did not release official sales figures. March 24, 2020 2:47 p.m. ET Order Reprints Print Articles Photography Eizele/AFP via Getty Images Shares in space travel firm Virgin Galactic Holdings have fallen back to Earth due to outbreak of coronavirus. The shares fell more than 70% compared to the February 2020 peak. That's enough for at least one Wall Street analyst. Morgan Stanley's Adam Jonas updated Tuesday's stock equivalent buy. Despite this, it has reduced its target price for the stock to $24 from $30. The world has changed over the past month, Jonas writes in a research report on Tuesday. However, history and balance remain intact. Even with the turmoil in the market, he saw 90% up in equities, catalyzing his ratings action. Some of these up are already eaten. Shares of Virgin Galactic (ticker: SPCE) rose 22.2 percent on Tuesday to $15.85. The S-P 500 index rose 6.8 percent. It was an incredible trip for the Galactic Reserve. At some point in February, the stock rose more than 220% for the year. They fell 72 percent from a high to a low of $10.49. The stock was nearly $13 before Jonas updated it. In his report, he called the action a great space coaster. Given the volatility it seems apt through it all, shares rose about 12% year-on-date before Tuesday's update fueled the jump. This is much better than comparable falls in the S-P 500 and the Dow Jones Industrial Average. One of the reasons Galactic has gotten better is ironically because it doesn't have sales yet. The company expects to start flights of tourists to the edge of space in 2020. The lack of sales seems to isolate the company from some of the worst of the Covid-19 fallout. This is a strange situation, but bullish investors still believe in the prospects of space tourism as well as other opportunities that the company holds. In the future, Galactic wants to expand from spaceflight to hypersonic travel, i.e. traveling at a speed about five times the speed of sound. In theory, a flight to a cross country can take only an hour. Jonas values the space tourism business at $14 per share and the hypersonic flight opportunity at $10 per share to come to its current target price. The $10 hypersonic cost is built on the belief that the superfast flight market could wipe $800 billion by 2040. Air travel around the world, for context, generates about $865 billion in sales.
